Archaeology 450: 4 credits for the F-11

From May 15 to June 3 students will live on the site of the Ames Plantation in Fayette County, TN and participate in the excavation of archaeological remains. Field work and lab processing occupies the mornings and early afternoons, while late afternoons and evenings are reserved for discussions and writing.

You do not need previous archaeological field experience. This is a field methods class that requires students to live and work together as a group while contributing to the success of a research project.

The field school emphasizes multidisciplinary approaches to archaeology. Topics for discussion are drawn from a variety of disciplines including the history and geology of West Tennessee, zoo-archaeology, botany, architectural history, and social history.
