Chicago Packinghouse
Refused To Hire Women

CHICAGO — (AP) — Swift & Co., the largest of the nation’s ‘Big Four’ meat packing companies, last week was found guilty of refusing to hire Negro women in its plants here after it was ordered to hire the women at once.

Swift must pay the women back wages from November 1950, the time they applied for work at the plant. Seniority rights of the women who are now employed to that date.

A trial held in Chicago, a Negro woman named Emma Packer filed a claim with the National Labor Relations Board in September 1950 that based on the refusal of the company to hire her.

The case was heard in Chicago and the Board recommended that the company hire the women and pay them back wages. The company appealed the case to the National Labor Relations Board.

The Board upheld the decision of the National Labor Relations Board and ordered the company to hire the women and pay them back wages.

200,000 Southern Workers Receive Wage Increases

More than 200,000 workers in the South were awarded wage increases ranging from 5 cents an hour to $1. A study of the situation concluded that the average rate was $3.50 an hour. The increases were for over 100,000 men and women employees. The 200,000 wage increases were paid by the companies involved, and the increases were divided on the basis of 15 percent of the employees' earnings. The increases were for employees working in various industries, including manufacturing, transportation, and construction. The study showed that the wage increases were due to improved working conditions and increased productivity. The study also noted that the wage increases were not based on a union agreement, but rather on the companies' decision to increase wages.
