

Claudia Rankine, Author of Citizen: An American Lyric Speaks at Rhodes

CITIZEN

AN AMERICAN LYRIC

CLAUDIA RANKINE

STAFF WRITER

Poet Claudia Rankine recently took the stage of the Evergreen church to speak about her book Citizen: An American Lyric. She had a powerful yet welcoming presence, one with the ability to silence the Evergreen auditorium in a split second. She spoke frankly about the issues of race and politics in our society using her book of longform poetry.

During President Marjorie Hass' introduction, the students learned of the incredible feats Rankine accomplished. Rankine was the recipient of the National Book Critics Circle award, the LA Times Book Award and the MacArthur Foundation's "genius grant." President Hass went so far as to dub her "a prophet of our times." As Rankine began to speak, it became clear how the religious connection was made.

Her book is a genre-bending mixture of essays, poetry and artwork. She read from it while explaining the significance of the artwork used. All while a projector flipped through the images. Students found this method to be powerful—especially first-years who read the novel over the summer.

"I thought it was really interesting to see how she explained her interpretations of the artwork," Isabelle Lam '21 said.

"Professor Rankine treated the audience to a small glimpse into the way great poetry is made with careful thought toward craft and how even the smallest units of language can work to push forward the poet's goals and themes," Jenny Boehm '20—a self-proclaimed "huge fan" of Rankine's work—said.

Rankine's poetry spoke to not only our national political and social climate but to issues within the Rhodes borders.

"Claudia Rankine's piece on Citizen was a refreshing challenge to this incoming Class of 2021. I was thankful for her wit and style as she smoothly poked fun at gated communities and the complicit prejudices to a tense, stagnant room. We may suffer amnesia in this castle but today no one needed to look past this last weekend in Saint Louis to remember the real impact of her stories in our lifetime," Marshall Allston-Yeagle '21 said.

Rankine also spoke about the impact of current National Football League protests. After the presentation, Rankine opened up the questions to the audience. There was talk about social movements such as Black Lives Matter, issues within our political society and how people must learn to speak openly and freely about race in order to move forward.

Chess Club Is Back and Making Moves

BY AYALITA CROSTON '20

Back in Black (and white): Rhodes Chess Club

While kings, queens and knights may seem like a thing of the past, the Rhodes College Chess Club has brought them back in style.

"I reestablished Chess Club at Rhodes College this year, the third time that Chess Club has been on Rhodes campus due to it dying out in the past," Chess Club President Alison Chang '18 said.

While it had issues previously, the club has returned and plans on keeping it that way. More and more members have shown up weekly after the club placed ads in previous issues of the Sou'wester, put up flyers, participated in the SACK fair and spread the message by simple word of mouth.

"I regularly update the email list with new members that appear at each meeting and brainstorm ideas with my fellow Chess Club mates to start hosting chess tournaments with both Rhodes students and the greater Memphis community," Chang said.

Many members of chess club, including the president, emphasized that there is no need to be good at chess, or even know how to play, in order to join this club.

"As many chess club members may attest to this, I am honestly mediocre in chess," Chang said. "The goal was to bring people together with the same interest on campus since I knew a lot of eager chess players were hiding and probably unaware of the presence of other players around them."

Even those who already play within a specific group will be able to find benefit in joining the chess club.

"I used to play with all the same people and it got really boring," Will Gattabontton '20 said. "Not to say any names but some people have a style of play that's really annoying to play against."

Many members within chess club have had a lot of experience and teach chess to kids at other schools in Memphis with the Mid-South Chess Club. It has become easy for new players to learn or have friendly competition among the more advanced players.

"[Chess] aids one in thinking critically, and playing with a fellow chess mate will always help one improve in the future because they can learn a new move, skill, or trick from their opponent," Chang said.

Chess requires individuals to think strategy and memorize the way pieces move. Moves are always thought out in advance and plans are put into place. Some chess members play different renditions of the game that allows for new ways of play.

"I am absolutely astounded by the myriad of combinations of how a chess game can play out," Chang said. "It requires long and hard consideration to make a single move in order to attack the other side for one's benefit."

Chess club will meet every Tuesday night on the third floor of Clough from 8-9.

Rhodes Radio Coming to You Live

BY NOAH MESA '21

Rhodes Radio will officially relaunch Monday October 9th in the Lair from 5:30 – 7:30 p.m. Featuring live music that will be aired on rhodesradio.com (where all feature programs will air), the Rhodes Radio President and part of the Radio Leadership Corps, Caleb Fowler '18, has grand aspirations for the future of this station on campus.

"Rhodes Radio as a name is bringing another media outlet to the community. We want to serve Rhodes member and community members. Particularly, to give a platform to students to express themselves," Fowler said.

Rhodes Radio will include faculty and staff in the Rhodes dialogue as well.

They will try to interview different portions of the Rhodes community about their interesting stories so "radio can be a way to connect those populations."

Rhodes Radio has had a long and rich history which started in the mid-twentieth century when it was known as WYLY 87.9 under George McClintok. In its prime, it interviewed famous artists from Billy Joel, Frank Zappa and even Black Sabbath. Today, Rhodes Radio has shifted from being a station to being accessible on the website, rhodesradio.com. The current goal of Rhode Radio will be to have "around the clock broadcasting;" they are still accepting DJs and new program ideas.

"If [Rhodes members] want to be a part of this, it's not too late," Fowler said.

Rhodes Radio has been seeking a diverse range of entertainment and programming. Poetry reading, live music, and even talk shows will all be welcome in their studios. Any show ideas should be emailed to rhodesradio901@gmail.com. Fowler said that if "DJs bring in the news, we'd be happy" and will not exclude any ideas on the basis of ideology as long as the show has potential.

Fowler has appreciated the support the radio has already received for the interest at SACK Fair, proposed shows, and the positive response for administration. The equipment has been better maintained than expected which should improve the quality of recording and streaming shows. The studio has moved from their previous location in Briggs to the basement of Barret Library.

Fowler expressed long-term ambitions for the show to "starting small, then we can grow." Rhodes Radio will be a student-led initiative which will be reflected in their policy on advertisements. "We're not making any money, and we aren't making any profits nor do we intend to," Fowler said.

Given all these changes and the rich history of Rhodes Radio, Caleb Fowler remarked that this will be a "new era" for the organization. The upcoming relaunch will just be the start of opportunities to show support for the radio. As to how the Rhodes community can help besides pitching show ideas, Fowler put it simply: "We'd be honored if they listened."

Rhodes Activities Board Throws One Helluva Formal for the Second Year in a Row

BY GRACE LEMONS '20
STAFF WRITER

The Rhodes Activities Board (RAB) hosted its second annual formal on Friday, September 29th at the Memphis Racquet Club. The location remained a surprise to students as they were chartered on buses every forty-five minutes to and from the event. During the formal, students enjoyed refreshments from Gibson's Donuts and the venue—including the crowd-favorite mini corndogs. There was a Selfie Station set up in the lobby with a green screen so students could transport themselves to the beach, underwater or even Beale Street. Members of RAB were pleased with the turnout and responses from the student body.

"RAB was super excited to give first years their first formal experience and it seemed like everyone had a great time!" RAB's Vice President Ryan Rosenkrantz '19 said.

"RAB Formal was a hit for the second year in a row! The dance floor was packed the entire night, the photo booth that Class Council provided was in constant use and there wasn't a single donut left when the clock struck midnight!" RAB board member Ashley Carpenter '20 said. "We've had nothing but awesome feedback—props to [Lead Event Coordinator for the formal] Lily Flores for leading such a crowd-pleasing event!"

There was certainly no shortage of first years on the dance floor or classic hits played by the DJ (who received more negative reviews from attendees than the event overall). However, RAB formal was free and open to students of all years as an opportunity for students—greek and non-greek—to experience a formal party. There have been few events the past few years, outside of Homecoming and Rites of Spring, attended by such a large and varied portion of the student body. This inclusive quality made the event the perfect opportunity to get to know classmates as more than just the person who sits behind you in Psychology class.

Chi Omega Grants "Wishes for Wings"

BY KATIE BREWSTER '18
CHIEF COPY EDITOR

Chi Omega held a "Wings for Wishes" at last weekend's tailgate to benefit the Make-A-Wish Foundation, a philanthropy that will arrange experiences described as "wishes" for children with life-threatening medical conditions. There was a little something for everyone at the event with barbecue, teriyaki, mild, medium and spicy wings, both boned and boneless for those worried about making a mess. The plates were $5 for 5 wings but there was also a deal for $1 Insomnia Cookies, a bargain for a variety of cookies which usually costs $1.60 apiece in-store.

The main event of the afternoon was the wing eating contest. Twenty men and women competed in two heats to see who could eat ten wings in the shortest amount of time. The contestants sat around the table with large paper bibs covering their clothing. The event's facilitators made sure everyone was aware of the rules as they passed around liability waivers.

"If you find yourself choking, please stop and go get water. A competition for charity is not worth dying over."

There was a Chi Omega member standing behind each contestant to make sure they properly cleaned the bone. Once all ten were perfectly clean, contestants had to raise their hands and open their mouths to prove they were truly finished. The participants had different strategies as they reached into large bins of wings. Some went for drumsticks, others for the classic wing. Participants Hannah Schadey '18 and Sarah Ryan '18 admitted to watching instructional videos ahead of time.

"Proper technique for a drumstick is to eat it like a corn on the cob. Ripping the wings open also really speeds up the process," Ryan said.

In the end, Owen Kelley '21 emerged victorious with an impressive time of 50 seconds and 52 milliseconds. Luis Vela '19 placed in second and Emma Selner '18, a member of Chi Omega, came in third. As the winner of the contest, Kelley received a Mardi Gras rugby style shirt. The event was highly successful financially as well, raising $1500 for the Make-A-Wish Foundation.

Exploring Memphis through Food: DWJ Korean BBQ

BY JACOB GREENBERG '21 &
SAM BROWN '21
STAFF WRITERS

This time we decided to visit a restaurant a little closer to home. DWJ Korean BBQ is an unassuming but fantastic dive that can take you on the food adventure of a lifetime. With a variety of options to choose, we found that our time at the restaurant was best spent grilling with the Korean BBQ option. For those that don't know, Korean BBQ is a type of grilling in which the customer orders different types of meat and places them on the grill in the middle of the table. Located on Young Avenue, this place is close to campus and worth the short trip.

When we first sat down I noticed that there were Korean game shows playing on one of the TVs. These wacky and seemingly complicated shows greatly contrasted with the simplicity of the food found there. For our first course, we ordered pan-fried Korean dumplings called goonmandu that were filled with vegetarian ingredients and served with a savory soy sauce that complemented the fillings phenomenally. This tasty appetizer had not yet sated our appetites and we were getting antsy to order the next course—the Korean BBQ itself. The bulgogi, thinly cut beef mar-inated in a sweet special sesame sauce, bubbled on the grill as we waited for our first taste of this delicious cut. Next was the brisket which was again thinly sliced for quick and effective cooking and served along with a sauce made of sesame oil, salt and pepper. Along with the meal we were served a bowl of rice. The rice soaked up the flavors of all the juices from the meats and was a burst of wonder in every bite.

In any case, a meal is not a meal without quality sides. We had our hearts set on getting four of the side dishes. Each one was only .50 cents but had its own character. The kimchi was spicy and bitter. The kimchi cucumbers were similar to the regular kimchi but less bitter and had a crisp, refreshing taste. The fish cakes were like the bread of the meal, you just can't not eat it. Finally, the cold potato salad was sweet with corn and other veggies.

The cost was a little more expensive than other places we have reviewed, around $14-$16 per meal. The amount that you get for the price is well worth it. For the kind of drab atmosphere but delicious and fun food experience we give DWJ a 3.5/5.

How Memphis Recognizes Hispanic Heritage Month

BY WHO CAN BE FOR CERTAIN '21-18
STAFF WRITER

Hispanic Heritage Month begins on the 15th of September, the national independence day for many South and Central American countries, and lasts through October 15th. National organizations such as the Library of Congress, the Smithsonian Institution and the National Park Service dedicate the month to the generations of Hispanic Americans who have positively enriched and influenced the country.

As of 2015, nearly 57 million people shared Hispanic heritage in the US. In Memphis alone, the Hispanic population accounts for nearly a quarter of the population. In Memphis there are countless opportunities to celebrate National Hispanic Heritage Month. There have been events to celebrate the diversity of the Latino community such as Prisma, Memphis' Second Annual Hispanic LGBTQ+ parade and festival. Cazateatro, a local bilingual theatre group, will host a Día de los Muertos Parade and Festival on October 7th at the Memphis Brooks Museum of Art.

In addition to attending events, people can honor the month by supporting one of the 3,000 local Hispanic small businesses and nonprofits that serve the Hispanic community like Latino Memphis, Centro Cultural Latino de Memphis and Mid-South Immigration Advocates—among others. There are so many ways to recognize and celebrate Memphis' Hispanic culture this month (and every month.)

Rhodes College Shows Its Pride

BY JORDAN HULSEBERG '19
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

Memphis' Mid-South Pride Festival and Parade took place downtown on Beale Street for its 14th annual celebration last Saturday, Sep. 30. The event was well attended with over 10,000 people in participation.

Among those in participation was Rhodes College's Gender and Sexuality Alliance. GSA marched with an overwhelming number of students, faculty and staff—approximately 130. This would make it one of the largest—if not the largest—organization to have marched in the parade. Students in participation were given a solid-colored "Rhodes College Pride" shirt—equally divided among the colors of the rainbow. En masse, it appeared as though an army color marched down the Mid-South's most famous street. Last year, GSA won the parade's "Most Spirited" award; and although unable to keep that title, they successfully secured "Best Use of Theme" this year.

GSA President Lee Kezar '19 said, "Pride is always a highly-anticipated event in the Memphis community, because it gives the LGBTQ+ community an opportunity to come together in an area where sexuality and gender identity aren't always visible or celebrated.

It's a reminder that we are a large community which transcends the divisions that we talk about on a daily basis. It's empowering that in this diversity we find unity, and it inspires me and many others to continue our work."

Regardless, Kezar made it clear that Rhodes College's participation in the Mid-South Pride Festival and Parade would not have been possible without the assistance of the college's LGBTQ+ Working Group.

"As for Rhodes involvement, it was a huge success. ...It was a success also in part due to the LGBTQ+ Working Group. They provided the funding to provide Rhodes Pride t-shirts and free transportation," Kezar said.

Though the parade was relatively short-lived—especially in comparison to its national counterparts—and lasted only 20 minutes, celebrations continued for the rest of the afternoon and evening at the Pride Festival—located across the street from the starting location of the parade. Food trucks, henna tattoos, vendors and even a wrestling tournament populated this space.

After the actual festival had concluded, the after-parties began. Clubs and bars such as Dru's Place, the Pumping Station and Spectrum, which closed indefinitely after that night, held their own nighttime celebrations.

BY BRANDON JOHNSON '19
RHODES COLLEGE DEMOCRATS
PRESIDENT

The solution to the North Korea problem is difficult to grasp. I agree with my Republican friends. The past three administrations have kicked the can down the road. Bill Clinton's diplomacy didn't work. George W. Bush's sanctions didn't work. And Barack Obama's "strategic patience" was not very effective. I also agree with my Republican friends that we need a new solution that is outside of the box. But before I describe the new prescription to the North Korea crisis, I think it's important to take a look through the perspective of the two other actors that are involved in this conflict.

First let's look at North Korea.

North Korea for decades has had deal with threats from the United States, China, and the United Nations, to their regime. The regime that began after the Korean War of 1952 with the rise of Kim Il Song and succeeded by Kim Jong Il was nuclear weapons capabilities by China to deter American invasion. However, the Kim regime worked feverishly to increase their nuclear capabilities because they wanted one thing: legitimacy on the world stage. And their plan worked quite well. The nuclear weapons that North Korea built, although not capable of reaching the United States, have given the North Koreans enough legitimacy to be taken seriously by the U.N. Security Council. As they weapons program continued to progress, the Kim regime had another goal in mind: deterrence from regime change. The single most important goal of the Kim regime was to protect its regime power from foreign attempts to topple it. And having nuclear weapons makes a typically aggressive and capable like the United States or even China skiddish when it comes to addressing the security issues that North Korea present. So when it comes to giving up their nuclear weapons, negotiating directly with the regime will never persuade the North Koreans.

Then there's China.

The Chinese have propped up the Kim regime in North Korea since the end of the Korean War. They have shipped billions of dollars of food, water, and military equipment to the regime, allowing them to stay afloat. Outside policy observers wonder why. What is China's endgame? They ask. Why would China support such a crazy regime? What does China have to gain from this? Well the answer is relatively straightforward. First we need to acknowledge that China is not particularly fond of North Korea's actions either. And they are starting to question where their billions in aid is going. But nevertheless China has two main concerns about preemptively ending the North Korea regime. The first is the Americanization of the Korean Peninsula. China has feared Americanization of Korea since the Korean War. It was China's threat of intervention in the Korean War that halted the U.S. advance along the peninsula. China has largely tolerated North Korea's behavior because the view North Korea as a buffer state the protects China from American troops and American interests. China has little interest in any American deals that would allow America to determine the destiny of the entire peninsula. The second fear is North Korean refugees. They have not toppled the regime as of late because they fear a flood of North Korean refugees into their country. They fear a group of people who are malnourished, institutionalized and displaced.

Now that we understand the perspective of North Korea and the concerns of China, we can finally address the controversial solution that was mentioned at the beginning. How do we deescalate the situation in North Korea?

We must first bring China to the negotiation table in secret. If North Korea gets word of the meeting through media reporting it could spark more erratic behavior from Kim Jong Un, who would be deeply suspicious of a deal between China and the United States that involves the regime. Then in secret we would discuss the terms with China.

First.

The U.S. would withdraw all troops from the 38th parallel, and build a secure border between North Korea and South Korea.

Second.

In exchange, China would remove the Kim regime from power and destroy the nuclear weapons. The proof of their destruction and disposal would be a test that passes United Nations weapons inspections.

Third.

China would have the authority to secure the North Korean border and to decide the new government that would reside in Pyongyang under the condition that the new government would not have access to nuclear weapons.

This solution is as outside of the box as advertised. It would involve months or even years of negotiations. A secure border would be costly for the United States. And potentially millions of lives would be lost in North Korea should the Chinese militarily attack the Kim regime.

However it accomplish two very important and remarkable outcomes. One the U.S. could help destabilize the peninsula without firing a shot. And two the Chinese would have complete autonomy over the direction of its buffer state North Korea. And it is these objectives that will both negotiating parties to walk away from the table knowing that the world is a much safer place.

Hello there!

For the rest of the academic year you will notice some political discourse in our Letters to the Editor section of the paper. Each month, Rhodes College Republicans and Rhodes College Democrats will select a topic to discuss for the entire month. They will take turns and write into the paper every other week—responding to what the other organization had written the week prior. For the month of October, the two organizations will be discussing the North Korean crisis.

We encourage you to respond to their discourse in a letter as well. Letters can be submitted to rhodesnews@gmail.com.

Underground Sports: Paintball

BY HOPE JOHNSON '19
OPERATIONS EDITOR

The underground sport of paintball has at long-last made it to Rhodes campus culture. Last fall, President Will Raines '19 started the Rhodes College Paintball Club.

"I started the club because I personally think paintball is a fun sport and good source of exercise. Its also a great way to meet people you might not have the opportunity to otherwise," Raines said.

While some have debated about it, paintball is in fact a sport that requires fixed objectives, team strategy and physical agility. Like standard elementary school games of color tag and dodgeball, paintball turned children's play into a dynamic battle with catapulting paintballs in an arena similar to that of The Hunger Games. The club opened to both rookie and veteran paintballers and has travelled to Paintball Park in Bartlett, TN about 4 times per semester.

At the park, the club has been given opportunities to play rounds with other paintball players at the park that day. Rounds have started at 10 players but could grow as large as 60, all with varying ranges of playing experience. Were a student to go to the park alone they would pay $45, but through the club a student only has to pay $10. This includes hours of playing time, equipment rental and paintballs.

"The club draws an array of Rhodes Students and it's a great way to meet new people that have the common interest of paintball," Paintball Club's Public Relations Chair Tyler George-adis '20 said.

Both Raines and the staff of Paintball Park have followed all standard safety rules and new members were taught how to properly use equipment. Since establishing, the Paintball Club has grown its campus engagement by 80%. Raines averaged approximately 10-15 people per trip to play, although there will still be room to grow. Catch Rhodes College Paintball club on Facebook for updates and information on how to join!

ADS & SATIRE

Attention: Emergency at Hand

BY MADELINE DEAN '19
SATIRE WRITER

There is a palpable tension on this campus. We can all feel it and sense its underlying urgency in every one of our conversations yet no one has had the guts to talk about it. Out of all the issues being discussed right now, this is the most important. This silence must end. I'll be the first to say it: we need to water the grass more.

For those who aren't aware, the kind of grass we have at Rhodes is called Agua Sorbere (Latin for "more water"). This type of grass needs intense upkeep, requiring 6 gallons of water per minute to remain hydrated. We can all tell it's dying. It's only watered about 5 times a day which is a quarter of how much it should be (and to be honest, I personally feel that the sprinklers should be running 24/7 in order to ensure maximum water coverage). The sprinkler systems also water the sidewalk roughly 80% of the time which is unfair to both the grass and the sidewalk. The sidewalk should have its own sprinkler system, so that it gets the water it needs while not taking away from the grass's own supply.

Anyone who has set foot on the lawns around campus can attest to how dry the grass has become lately. When you step on it, your foot only becomes slightly damp instead of soaked through. Walking on the grass should feel like accidentally stepping into the shallow end of a pool or like a wave from the ocean has just crept up on your feet. This is the only way to ensure the grass is being watered enough.

To meet these watering needs, we must hire 1 person per square foot of grass to pour a constant stream of water onto each blade. Unfortunately, we'll have to fire all of our professors in order to afford these new employees, but this will be an exciting new work study opportunity for students! Worried you won't bond with your co-workers? Have no fear—the "Blade Buddies" program will partner co-workers together as they watch over their respective blades of grass.

I expect that the gravity of this situation has been made clear. The grass simply isn't being watered enough, and we must take action to keep it alive. As the old saying goes: "mo' water, no problems."

A Thief Among Us

BY WARREN SOCHER '19
SATIRE WRITER

In the spirit of the Sou'wester Spotlight news team, the satire section is now embarking on a sleuthing expedition which will leave the readers realizing they may be a victim of a campus-wide burglary ring. These may or may not be isolated incidents. Here I will share several personal narratives of those victimized by the laundry room sock thieves of Rhodes College.

Trey Picnickson. Junior. Rhodes Lacrosse. After a long day in his finance class and at lax workouts, he returned to his room with a Lair burrito and two queso cups to do laundry. When he finished his laundry and put his clothes away, he noticed that his most coveted white Nike tube socks were low in quantity. "What the hell?" he exclaimed. "What will I tuck my sweatpants into now?"

After noticing a peculiar pattern of my own socks disappearing after I do laundry, I decided to do some investigating. My original thought was to implicate my roommate as I saw some Nike socks on his side of the room that looked eerily similar to mine. But, at the same time, all Nike socks look the fucking same so that was a dead end.

Before my investigation, I headed out to Target to reclaim what was unlawfully taken from me: my white Nike socks. But alas, they did not have them in stock. So I had to settle for NBA brand tube socks. This happened to suck almost as much as losing my Nike socks because being asked the question "Oh what's up bro you tryna hoop at 5?" gets super old. I had no choice but to settle, however, even though it meant being a total poser.

I questioned former residents of the Flats, who had similar sock disappearance stories. They all seem to align, weirdly enough, but only with those who live in the Flats. In freshman dorms—doing laundry for the first time in four weeks after having worn the same Slimeyard Slimes shirt three times in a row—one may notice a single sock has disappeared as they spy one lonely sock without a mate at the bottom the hamper. This is just plain bad luck; or, perhaps, it is simply a crime of vindication as those who have lost socks to theft turn to a life of sock-crime to regain what they lost.

However, several people in Parkway Hall have not reported not only individual missing socks but rather a steady decrease in the number of pairs. The realization is slow, over the course of about two or three months, as students realize the pairs aren't in their chest of drawers after subsequent laundry loads like they originally thought. Take note that individual socks are not found as frequently.

Is our culprit a vitriolic menace lurking in the shadows of the Rhodes College laundry room dungeons, a plunderer in plain sight, or just someone who said to themselves as they piled their laundry, "Yea this is probably mine"?
