FILMS OF ALFRED HITCHCOCK AND FRANÇOIS TRUFFAUT

Spring Semester 2006 3 credit hours

PROF. VEST

Taught in English; readings in English; French films are dubbed or have English subtitles.

Satisfies distribution requirement in the Humanities.

Counts as a course toward the Film Studies Minor.

Does not count toward the French major or minor.

Does not count toward the College Language Proficiency requirement.

Alfred Hitchcock had an intense lifelong fascination with French language, literature, cinema, art, and cuisine. He received top honors in French at Saint Ignatius academy in London, honeymooned in Paris with his bride—film editor Alma Reville—whom he referred to as “Madame” (pronounced in the French manner) throughout their half century of married life, returned often with her to French-speaking Europe and Africa, and, when his family moved from Britain to California, continued to order meals flown in from Maxim’s in Paris. His houseguests remarked on the Aubusson carpets and the impressive collection of works by Braque, Rouault, Dubuffet, Dufy, and Rodin, as well as vintage French wines.

One-fourth of Hitchcock’s films included substantial allusions to France or sequences in French. Two wartime shorts, Bon Voyage and Aventure Malgache, were entirely in French. Hitchcock’s international renown owed much to French critics associated with the Cahiers du Cinéma and the nouvelle vague: Eric Rohmer and Claude Chabrol were among the first filmmaker-theorists to take Hitchcock seriously, and François Truffaut enshrined him as the quintessential film auteur, i.e., as controlling cinematic creator/artist. Even the curmudgeonly André Bazin, who initially dismissed Hitchcock as a formulaic trickster, was forced to reconsider.

The passion ran both ways. Hitchcock exerted an extraordinary degree of influence on French film. Nowhere is this clearer than in the career of director-critic François Truffaut. Truffaut's marathon interviews with Hitchcock in 1962 provide a focal point for this course, which will explore Hitchcock's films of the 1950s that inspired Truffaut. We will examine Truffaut's films of the 1960s and 1970s that owe much to Hitchcock as well as to Bernard Hermann, composer for eight Hitchcock films, to whom Truffaut turned for musical scoring.

To further acquaintance with the works of both directors, major films by each will be screened and discussed, as per the attached schedule.

Selected articles on literary-film theory by Bazin, Hitchcock, Insdorf, Modleski, Ferrara, Vilién, Vest, Wood, and others will focus classroom discussion on thematic and formal strategies to create and sustain suspense, e.g., storyboarding, composing, framing, camera angle and movement, montage, and use of lighting and sound.

During the semester students will write and present orally in class two 4 page reaction papers (personal response papers incorporating aspects of our common readings and class discussions) and also produce a final exercise (8-10 page research paper or 18-20 page screenplay or 4-5 minute video) that demonstrates their understanding of the cinematic practice of both directors.
